Recent developments include a prompt method of diagnosing typhus, together with ways of immunizing against the disease and of discouraging attacks by lice. Active phages have been produced against dysentery, pus-forming cocci, and cholera; these may be used in combination with sulfa-therapy. Progress is being made in the study of regeneration of injured nerve tissue, and vitamin B therapy is being used successfully in some phases. Some success has also been attained in the treatment of bone and joint inflammations resulting from large wounds.
